Abstract The purpose of this study was to determine whether there were differences in the prevalence of risk factors for coronary artery disease between men who had been exposed to asbestos and those who had not. A case-control study was conducted among men aged 60 years or older who resided in the same community as the subjects of the first National Health and Medical Research Council Australian Lung Cancer Study. Cases were defined as men with a histologically confirmed diagnosis of coronary artery disease. Controls were randomly selected from the electoral roll. Information on potential risk factors was obtained by telephone interview. The results showed that the prevalence of smoking, hypertension, diabetes mellitus, hypercholesterolemia, and family history of coronary artery disease did not differ significantly between cases and controls. However, exposure to asbestos was more prevalent among cases than controls ($P = .007$). This finding suggests that exposure to asbestos may be associated with an increased risk of developing coronary artery disease.
